Strange as it may seem, historians and genealogists owe a great deal to the Great Depression, particularly those concerned with West Virginia history. It was that era's rampant unemployment that led directly to the Historical Records Survey, the most ambitious archival program in American history. Initiated in 1935 as part of Franklin D. Roosevelt's Works Progress Administration, the Historical Records Survey's purpose was to provide employment at the white collar and clerical levels while improving access to state and local records nationwide. The Survey's ultimate goal was to produce published inventories of records depositories in each of the nation's 3,066 counties. While considerable progress towards this end was accomplished, a variety of factors inhibited the Survey's completion. Foremost was the outbreak of World War II, which abruptly ended the nation's unemployment woes and subsequently the Works Progress Administration. Secondly, as if the original project goal was not sufficiently ambitious, lobbyists for a variety of special interest groups and sponsors succeeded in continually broadening the project's scope. Eventually in addition to county records offices, the Survey was charged with embracing manuscript collections, church archives, and early American imprints, in addition to a variety of other "special projects."

Such diversity succeeded in creating jobs—a workforce of nearly 10,000 workers was in place in 1938—yet its breadth spread resources thin. Subsequently, despite vast amounts of field research only about twenty percent of the project's endeavors were completed before the Survey closed in 1942.

Survey results differed greatly from state to state despite the use of standard forms and procedures supplied by the national office. Field workers were hired in each of the nation's counties to survey local records depositories by completing a project worksheet for each volume or group of records encountered. The worksheets were forwarded to a state office where information was compiled into a draft inventory. The inventories were returned to the field workers for rechecking against the originals and the addition of indexes and introductory essays concerning county history, government and records systems.

While the county-based system was better suited to some regions of the country than to others, (New England surveys found "town" records inventories more appropriate) the survey was successfully extended throughout the United States. Yet, as mentioned above, relatively few inventories were actually published by the project's end. Most remained in manuscript, consigned to the back shelves and basements of offices and archives that they were intended to elucidate. One of the major failings of the Historical Records Survey rests in its failure to provide for the permanent improvement of national records maintenance and retention standards, and tragically, many of the records inventoried by the project have been discarded and destroyed, along with the unpublished Survey records themselves.

Ironically, while the Survey's eventual diversity clearly weakened the main thrust of the project, the various extramural activities undertaken in many states have proven to be more significant than the inventories...
"Women" and "West Virginia University" are the combined topics that formed the subject of Patricia Lee Hankins' recent internship at the West Virginia Collection. A graduate student in the University's public history program, Hankins spent most of the spring 1987 semester poring over the Collection's photograph holdings in an effort to locate and catalog images of University women from their first enrollment in 1889 to the present. In addition to producing a published catalog to the photos, Hankins is also gathering information for the University's Center for Women's Studies for a West Virginia University Women's Centenary Celebration in 1989.

themselves. This is certainly the case with the West Virginia Survey.

The West Virginia Historical Records Survey officially began on April 17, 1936. Like other state surveys the emphasis of the first year's activity was on the preparation of county inventories. Field work was conducted in each county and inventory worksheets were forwarded to the state office in Charleston.

While embarkation upon special projects generally followed lengthy periods of concentration upon the county inventories, unique circumstances led to an early flowering of several useful undertakings in West Virginia. The Historic Records Project at West Virginia University actually got its start during the Civil Works Administration which preceeded the Historical Records Survey. Directed by Ernest Morris with the advice of Charles Ambler and Festus Summers, the West Virginia University project involved the physical transfer of county records to the West Virginia University Library where they were preserved and thoroughly indexed. Between 1935 and 1942, project staff procured the records of thirteen northern counties. Over a quarter of a million court cases were catalogued, conserved and thoroughly indexed, generating a card index of approximately three million names and subjects.

A second project adopted by the Survey was an index to vital statistics in county records up to about 1900. Sponsored initially by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, a special state Commission on Historic and Scenic Markers was formed for the purpose of locating and recommending appropriate sites around the state for placement of special plaques and monuments. In the course of their research fieldworkers began a series of transcriptions of nineteenth-century vital statistics—births, marriages, deaths and wills—which was eventually extended to all fifty-five counties.

The desire to provide researchers with the actual data rather than just inventories to the sources continued to guide the West Virginia Survey. In 1937 the state supervisor authorized a state-wide program of cemetery readings with the goal of publishing a series of inventories and indexes covering every cemetery and grave marker in West Virginia. Like virtually all the Historical Records Survey programs, extensive fieldwork was done but relatively little data reached publication.

By the close of the Historical Records Survey, the state survey had published approximately three dozen volumes, including twelve county inventories, guides to the papers of five West Virginia governors, inventories of federal archives in West Virginia, inventories to the archives of the Presbyterian and Episcopal churches, a checklist of West Virginia imprints, and other volumes including cemetery readings, wills, and vital statistics. The bulk of the survey, however, remained in manuscript.

Owing to a unique wealth of historical and genealogical data unlike that of any other state, the West Virginia Historical Records Survey has retained its significance over the years. Deposited at the West Virginia University Library in installments from the 1930s to the 1950s, the Historical Records Survey archives continue to serve as a fundamental research resource for genealogists and historians alike.

A group of West Virginia University women, disguised as "the Hezekiah Corntassel family," pose on the steps of newly constructed Women's Hall, 21 October 1921. The "family" won first prize in a costume contest during a "Country Fair" held in Oglebay Hall. See page 2.
