

8-22-2013

Arthur J. Altmeyer

Roger A. Lohmann

West Virginia University, roger.lohmann@mail.wvu.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://researchrepository.wvu.edu/faculty_publications

 Part of the Policy History, Theory, and Methods Commons, Social Policy Commons, Social Welfare Commons, and the Social Work Commons

Digital Commons Citation

Lohmann, Roger A., "Arthur J. Altmeyer" (2013). Faculty Scholarship. 811.
https://researchrepository.wvu.edu/faculty_publications/811

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by The Research Repository @ WVU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Scholarship by an authorized administrator of The Research Repository @ WVU. For more information, please contact ian.harmon@mail.wvu.edu.

Arthur J. Altmeyer/Citable Version

From Citizendium, the Citizens' Compendium

< Arthur J. Altmeyer

Arthur J. Altmeyer (1891-1972) was a key figure in the design and implementation of the U.S. Social Security system.

Early life and education

Altmeyer was born in Wisconsin and developed an early interest in social security while working as an office boy in his uncle's law office.^[1] For a while he was a public school teacher and school principal and also attended the University of Wisconsin-Madison where he studied with John R. Commons, one of a handful of American economists versed in social insurance who was actively interested in workers' compensation, unemployment insurance and health insurance. In 1918, Altmeyer became Commons' graduate research assistant. Together they co-authored a report on "The Health Insurance Movement in the United States" for the Illinois Health Insurance Commission and the Ohio Health and Old Age Insurance Commission.^[2] In 1931, Altmeyer earned a Ph.D. in economics from the University of Wisconsin.

Career

Altmeyer became Chief Statistician of the Wisconsin Industrial Commission in 1920 working under Edwin E. Witte. Altmeyer founded a monthly publication, the Wisconsin Labor Market, which was second such publications in the U.S. In 1922, after Witte had moved on, Altmeyer was appointed to his position as Secretary of the Wisconsin Industrial Commission, a position he held, with one interim, until 1932. In this position Altmeyer oversaw Wisconsin's worker's compensation program and developed and implemented the state's unemployment insurance system which was the first of its kind in the U.S. In 1927, he went on leave to assume a temporary federal position in the Great Lakes Region with responsibility for implementing the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.^[3]

In Spring, 1933, he was invited to Washington by Labor Secretary Frances Perkins to consult on relations with state labor departments. He advised the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and the Civil Works Administration. In November 1933, he was appointed Director of the Labor

Contents

- 1 Early life and education
- 2 Career
- 3 Social Security
- 4 Legacy and death
- 5 References

(PD) Photo: U.S. Social Security Administration
Arthur J. Altmeyer, probably during the 1920s. Social Security Administration History Archives
(<http://www.socialsecurity.gov/history/c>)

Compliance Division of the National Recovery Administration. He returned briefly to Madison in May 1934 but was almost immediately appointed Second Assistant Secretary of Labor.^[4]

Social Security

In June, 1934, Altmeyer, acting upon instructions from President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Secretary Perkins and Presidential Adviser Harry Hopkins, drafted for the president Executive Order 6757, which provided for creation of a Committee on Economic Security, the committee which oversaw drafting of the bill which became the Social Security Act of 1935. Perkins chaired the committee, and Altmeyer served as technical director. Other figures on the board included Hopkins, Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr., Attorney General Homer Cummings, and Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace. The Committee selected as its Executive Director Edwin E. Witte of the Economics Department at the University of Wisconsin and an expert in labor legislation.^[5]

Following passage of the Social Security Act, Altmeyer was appointed to the Social Security Board created by the act. Altmeyer, because of his background, education, and ability soon became the unacknowledged leader of the board. This was confirmed in 1937, when Roosevelt appointed Altmeyer as chairman of the board. Following revisions to the act in 1946, Altmeyer was appointed Commissioner of Social Security.

Altmeyer was the principal advocate for changes to the Social Security Act in 1939. He advocated for broadening the program from a personal retirement program to a family social insurance program, one that protected family dependents in the cases of death or disability and to care for families with dependent children.

The Social Security Board of 1937; Left to right: Mary M. Dewson, Arthur J. Altmeyer (Chairman) and George E. Bigge. Library of Congress (<http://www.loc.gov/pictures/item/hec2009010261>), 11/12/37

Altmeyer continued to advocated for expansion of Social Security benefits. In 1950 and 1952, he was able to persuade Congress to include workers not included under the original act. He also fought against Congress's inclination to make the Social Security Administration a place for patronage. These struggles against Congress ultimately led to his termination as Social Security Commissioner in 1953 when his re-appointment was not confirmed by a new Republican-controlled Congress.

Outside of Social Security, he was involved in implementation of a federal and state civil service merit system and for a policy making federal grants proportional to per capita state income.^[6] During World War Two, Altmeyer was the secretary of the War Manpower Commission. Following the war he served as secretary to the International Refugee Organization. As the leading authority on the U.S. social security system, he was also consulted by Latin American nations during the 1940s and 1950s when those nations began developing social security programs of their own.

Legacy and death

Through Altmeyer's leadership of the Social Security Board and Social Security Administration, he turned it into one of the best actuarial research offices of the U.S. government. He had a profound intellectual grasp of social policy issues as well as the administrative skills to turn policy into operation.^[7]

Following his death in 1972, the Social Security Administration renamed in his honor its Washington, D.C., headquarters.

References

- ↑ Arthur J. Altmeyer, The Formative Years of Social Security (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966), vii.
- ↑ Altmeyer (1968), p. viii; John R. Commons and Arthur J. Altmeyer, "The Health Insurance Movement in the United States (<http://books.google.com/books?id=Br1AAAAAYAAJ&lpg=PA287>)," Appendix A in The Ohio Health and Old Age Insurance Commission, Health, Health Insurance, Old Age Pensions, (Columbus: by the Commission, February 1919), 287-311.
- ↑ Altmeyer (1968), viii.
- ↑ Altmeyer (1968), ix; and David Brian Robertson, "Policy Entrepreneurs and Policy Divergence: John R. Commons and William Beveridge," The Social Service Review 62, no. 3 (September 1988), 513.
- ↑ ibid, p. 7.
- ↑ Jean K. Quam, "Altmeyer, Arthur J. (1891-1972)," Encyclopedia of Social Work, 19th ed, vol. 3 (New York and Washington DC: NASW Press and Oxford University Press), 2572.
- ↑ Helen R. Wright, "Mr. Altmeyer Resigns," The Social Service Review 27, no. 2 (June 1953), 217-218.

Retrieved from "http://en.citizendium.org/wiki?title=Arthur_J._Altmeyer/Citable_Version&oldid=100823173"

Categories: Subpages | History Extra Subpages | Sociology Extra Subpages | Economics Extra Subpages | History Approved Extra Subpages | Sociology Approved Extra Subpages | Economics Approved Extra Subpages | Citable versions of articles | History Citable Version Subpages | Sociology Citable Version Subpages | Economics Citable Version Subpages | All Content | History Content | Sociology Content | Economics Content

- This page was last modified 12:48, 22 August 2013.
 - CZ is free. All written content is available under the Creative Commons-Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported license or any later. Written content that originated in part from Wikipedia is also available under GNU Free Documentation License 1.2. Dedicated server hosting generously provided by Steadfast Networks
- Help • Financial Report • Statistics
- Follow Citizendium on Twitter • Facebook • Google+